City of Austin Affordable Rental Housing

This map shows existing City-funded or incentivized affordable rentals in relation to the proposed transit expansion. These investments were made by the City through several funding streams. Some are made possible through past community approved bond dollars like the 2018, 2013, and 2006 General Obligation Bonds. Others are made possible through affordable housing development incentive programs like the University Neighborhood Overlay (UNO) density bonus program or the Mueller development.

These affordable rentals are income-restricted and available to qualifying residents. Eligibility for affordable housing starts at generally making 60% or less of AMI, or Austin Area Median Income. For a family of four that translates to a maximum annual family income of $58,560 in 2020.

Affordable Housing in Austin

This map shows all existing income-restricted affordable housing units in relation to the City's Transit Priority Network and the proposed Project Connect transit expansion. These affordable housing investments were made by both the City and non-City organizations through several funding streams.

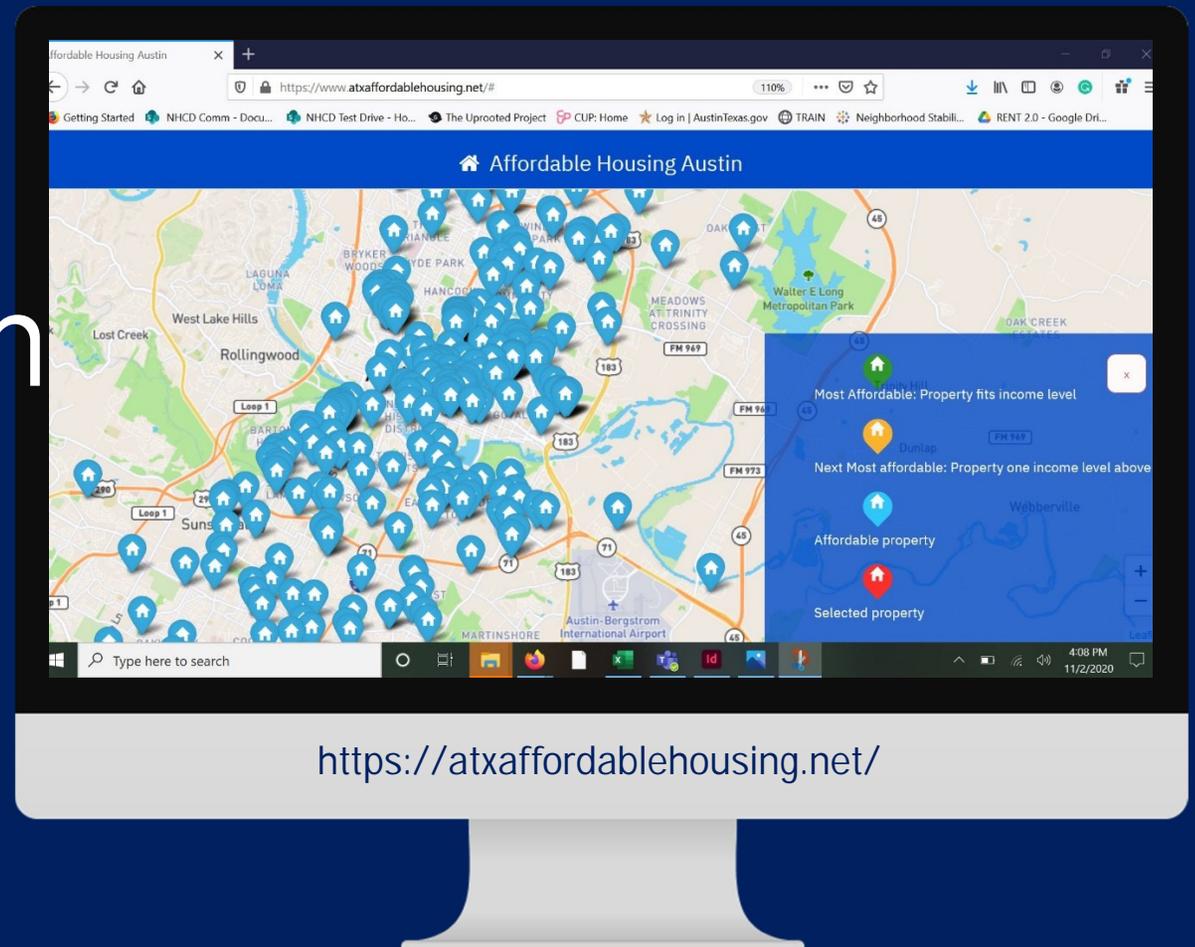

These affordable homes are income-restricted and available to residents making less than the Austin Area Median Family Income, or AMI. In 2020, the median income for a family of four in the Austin area was $97,600. Currently, there are over 26,000 units of income-restricted housing available that were subsidized or incentivized by the City and non-City organizations.
